Coffee Creek Center Nationally Recognized

Chesterton, IN- Lake Erie Land Company's Coffee Creek Center was featured in the December/January issue of Conservation Voices magazine and the January/February issue of This Old House, for its environmental sustainability and mixed-use design principles.

Lake Erie Land Company was recognized for its efforts to create a series of traditionally designed neighborhoods within Coffee Creek Center that move away from the cookie-cutter sprawl that is moving across America.

Coffee Creek Center's public spaces, such as overlooks, trails, and boardwalks are highlighted in these articles. Jerry Mobley, the president of Lake Erie Land Company, is featured on the cover of Conservation Voices enjoying the view of Coffee Creek while sitting beside the Creek Overlook. Jay Womack, a landscape architect with Conservation Design Forum and environmental design consultant to Coffee Creek, stated in the article, "We're not just developing a cornfield subdivision. There is no other place in the United States that's going to this depth and level to incorporate nature into the manmade environment and to have a sustainable community."

Coffee Creek Center is a more than 640-acre project in Northwest Indiana slated for up to 2,000 residential units and over 3 million square feet of commercial, office and retail space. The project's centerpiece is a more than 180-acre public conservation district. For more information, visit www.coffeecreekcenter.com.
